Story highlights In February, the Supreme Court overturned a federal judge's decision The government must have the most recent census data available Washington (CNN) The Supreme Court ruled Thursday that the federal government must have the most recent census data available when redrawing lines for congressional districts -- but that won't help Republicans in a few states. The court's 5-4 ruling set up the possibility of a new round of redistricting in Maryland, Pennsylvania and North Carolina, where the 2010 census data is likely to be critical. In February, the Supreme Court overturned a federal judge's decision that had halted the Republican-led state efforts to redraw House boundaries in those states.

Republicans in North Carolina and Pennsylvania had won control of their state legislatures and used the decision to change the lines of the House districts from the previous decade. Maryland's governor had the power to call a special session to redraw lines, but didn't. The justices said that the state can seek a new plan to draw congressional boundaries, but the first round of plans must reflect the 2010 data and the government must have the most recent census data available when redrawing lines for congressional districts.
