Traditional tools used to measure lipid profiles, such as total cholesterol (TC), triglyceride (TG) and high-density lipoprotein cholesterol (HDL-C) assays, cannot determine whether a lipid response, i.e. the change in a lipid profile from a starting point, is desirable. Also, these traditional tools cannot determine if a subject's lipid response is secondary to an undesirable lifestyle change, such as a change in diet, eating patterns or other lifestyle changes. Additionally, traditional tools cannot predict a lipid response based on a response of another lipid parameter (such as HDL-C) or based on a response of another general health parameter. Furthermore, conventional tools cannot automatically determine whether a lipid response is desirable in the context of a given lifestyle and/or current health parameters. Thus, there remains a need for systems and methods that allow healthcare providers to determine if a given lipid profile, or any other physiological parameter, is desirable or undesirable, and if so, what lifestyle or other changes in the subject's lifestyle can be made to move the lipid profile in a desirable direction.

Additionally, there remains a need for systems and methods that allow healthcare providers to determine whether a given lipid profile is desirable in the context of the subject's current health and lifestyle factors.
