FIFA 22 offers improved player control and responsiveness, while also giving players the opportunity to control off-ball movements to create more opportunities. With "HyperMotion Technology," players can make the right decisions when they have the ball and when they need to move off-ball using a combination of fast, accurate, and intelligent gameplay decisions. To record the motions of the 22 real-life players who will play FIFA 22, a special sensor system from Sensics was used. This sensor system includes a sensor mat, laser scanners, and tracking software, which was developed in collaboration with the new sensor manufacturer, Unique Sensing Technology. This sensor system accurately records the movements of a player, while also allowing them to detect events such as interceptions, passes, sprints and tackles. This data is seamlessly transmitted to the "Intelligent Soccer Engine," a motion-based AI that understands every type of real-life move, allowing the engine to respond, adapt and react to a player's actions on- and off- the-ball. "When we decided to create the Ultimate Team mode, we wanted to make sure the game delivered an authentic, fair and balanced game experience," said Andy Moore, SVP Studio Technology at Electronic Arts. "With "HyperMotion Technology," FIFA 22 allows us to deliver the ultimate performance on the pitch." "The new sensor technology that we are developing for FIFA 22 allows us to capture a close-to-perfect version of what a player really does in a match," said Christian Wiget, President at Unique Sensing Technology. "By having all these real-life data, we are able to deliver to the player, and to the developers, the ultimate sense of realism." In FIFA 22, the "Intelligent Soccer Engine" is also the key to unlock a player's true potential when playing with a limited number of players. By providing accurate data on players' movements, the game engine allows players to improve and fine-tune their game, while making the best decisions in the most creative ways. The new motion-capture technology also allows players to make game-changing moves off-ball that are not necessarily seen in other sports. FIFA 22 allows players to make off-ball runs in the same way that they can perform on-ball moves, while also being able to perform delicate and fast off-ball sprints that their teammates are unable to make
