Original Source URL: 2016-10-30 11:17:03Q: Websphere Message Logging I'm looking for a good way to log a large number of messages from a web application to the WebSphere MQ Server. I'm basically looking for an instrument of some sort that can give me the ability to define a custom message, put that into a bucket, and then control what happens when the custom message is read by a front end app. With that said, I'm currently looking at IBM's AquaLogger as a way to capture a large number of messages from an application. Unfortunately, most of the tutorials I've found for AquaLogger seem to be very old. Has anyone tried using AquaLogger? What are the major pain points of using it, and is it worth it over other approaches? A: It's been a while but this is how I think I would approach it. I think it would be beneficial to have a CI environment (a build farm perhaps?) that could read the messages from the "instrument of some sort" and spit out a set of messages that would be used in an MQ ad-hoc on-demand basis, so you could say "oh I want to put this X message into the on demand queue" and it would tell you "okay, it's there". That would cut out a lot of the middle man and complexity (and hopefully security) involved in dealing with the instrument. + 3 5 , 3 * l + 1 7 = - p - p f o r l . - 4 S o l v e 5 * z = - 1 5 , 9 * x = - 2 * z + 6 * x - 2 1 f o r x . - 3 S o l v e - 5 * y - 5 * w
